EXTRACT.

A CRY FROM AN ENGLISH HEART. O my country, my beloved native land! How I yearn to louch again thy distant strand To breathe, ecstatic, Freedom's bracing air; To roam once more through English meadows fair While, English accents falling on my ear, I dream of Raleigh, Drake, and great Shakespeare. And seek the starry clumps of pale primrose; Or the velvet moss where the violet grows : And mark thy homesteads and thy fertile fields, And say, "These joys alone old England yields!" Such gifts then ow'st to Heaven's bounteons hand, My country, my beloved native land! But now the blessed times of peace are past, The fateful, foretold hour has struck at last, When thou must don thy armour for the fight, With stern resolve to shield the sacred right. The Cossack wolves are prowling round thy fold-Their very number makes them over bold. Perchance then hear'st how sneering aliens speak: They say the lion now is old and weak, And much besides, which they would never of yore Have dared to fling against thy surf-washed shore. Thy foes no longer Pitt and Nolson drond, But Pitt's and Nolson's spirit is not dead. Its flame yet burns in every English breast; And enger hearts shall bound at thy behest, When thy proud bugle's note and drum's long rattle From far and near call all thy sons to hattle, O my country, my beloved native land !
